

Tumbling Glacier on the Wolverine Plateau

Trail Riders of the Canadian Rockies

BULLETIN No. 36

THE Eleventh Annual Trail Ride will start a few miles east of Leancoil on the morning of July 27th. The starting point is on the motor road a few miles west of Field, B.C., within easy distance of Emerald Lake Chalet or the Yoho Chalet Valley Bungalow Camp, and motor conveyance will be arranged for those who spend the previous night at either of those places. Camp in Ice River Valley will be pitched on the meadows at the foot of Shining Beauty Creek, an excellent centre for fishing, trail riding or climbing expeditions to the hanging valleys which are so characteristic of this district. Two nights will be spent here. The second Camp will be on the Wolverine Plateau, one of the most spectacular Alpine meadows in the Canadian Rockies, leaving an easy morning ride on the fourth day down Tumbling Creek to the Pow-Wow at Marble Canyon. Motor conveyance will be arranged after the Pow-Wow for Banff or Lake Louise. The inclusive rate for the four days, including such motor conveyance, will be $40.—Kindly advise L. S. Crosby, Western Secretary, Trail Riders, Banff, Alberta, without delay if you are planning to join this ride.

Members who have not yet paid their annual dues for the year 1933-34 are requested to send their cheques to J. M. Gibbon, Secretary Treasurer, Room 324, Windsor Station, Montreal, Canada.

THE ICE RIVER VALLEY

By MORLEY ROBERTS

(reproduced by permission from "The Old Trail")

Strange was the trail I had to ride,
Wild was the range where moose abide
Till even falls and shadows quiver
Deep in the lakes of the Ice River!

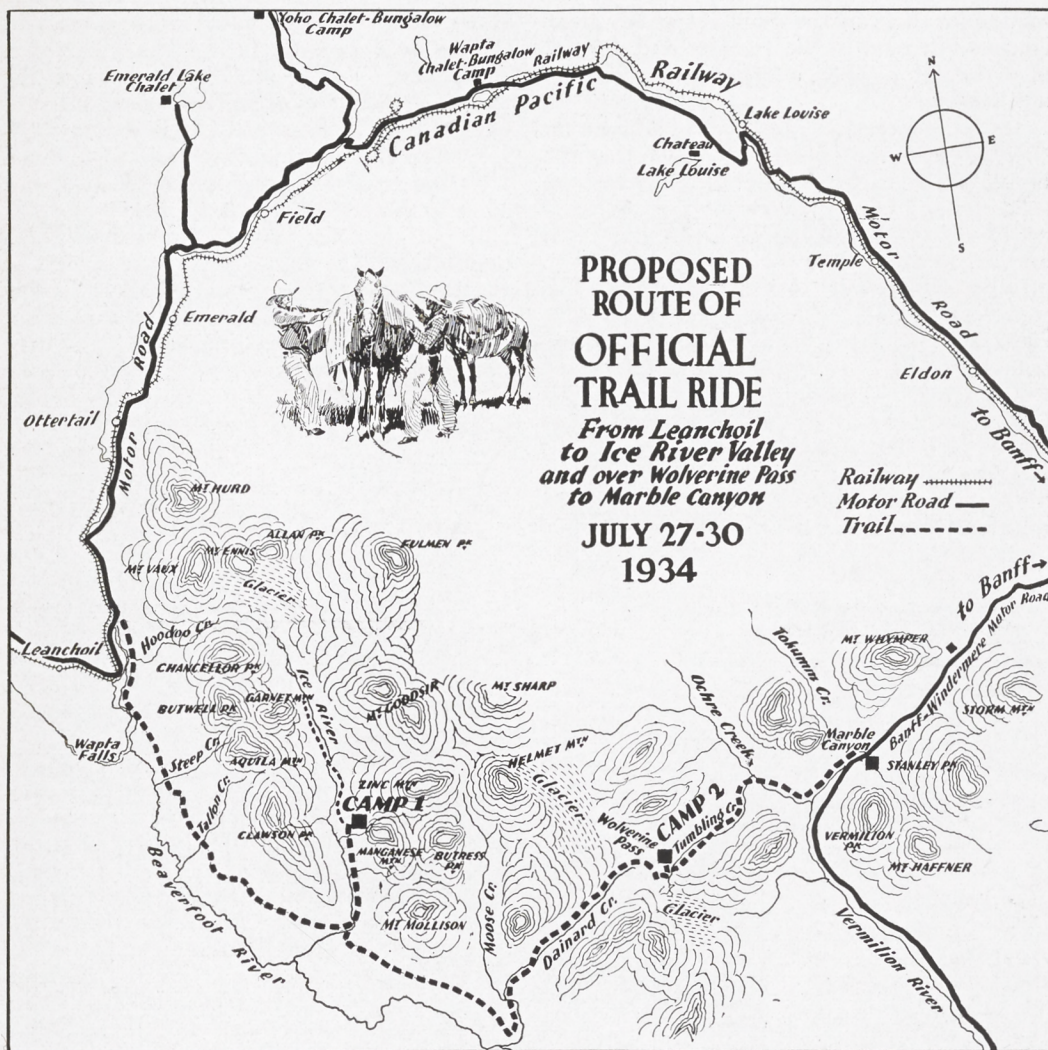

A salt-lick pool, a forest deep,
Silent and cool: Mount Goodsir steep
And stern, from cares my thoughts deliver,
And I cool my heart in the Ice River.

We camped not very far from the place at which we were to follow up the Ice River, which was now rising and riley, and at times we could hear it singing. Big Mount Mollison rose in the background. Our camp was the wildest and most natural we had yet struck and lay on the banks of a little mountain creek in fairly thick woods. While the others set up the tents and took the horses to a near feeding-ground I went to the creek and for the first time in over forty years did a Rocky Mountains clothes washing.

During "hash-pile," when we had attended eagerly enough to Williamson's "Come and get it," we got Nixon yarning, and he yarned very well, of his varied career since he left the woods and lakes of Ontario and came west to grow up with the country. In his twenty-seven years there he had been driving logs in the rivers, mining, hunting, road-and trail-making and guiding and doubtless a hundred other things as well. I did not pit my own varied career against his, although I have made a living, as an old list of my occupations shows, in about thirty different ways. One yarn of Nixon sticks in my memory as every adventure of cold weather does, as I hate it more bitterly than 120° in the shade. He had been hunting and had shot and skinned an elk (it may have been a moose), and came back with the pelt and some of the meat. He was far from camp and got benighted in hard frost without the means of making a fire. And this reminds me that no hunter or any wanderer in the wilds should ever leave camp without matches in a corked bottle or better still in a water-proof metal case. However, Nixon had omitted this precaution, so he made a bough bed and, wrapping the raw pelt round and round him, actually slept. But when he woke and tried to rise he could not do so. The bits of flesh and fat on the under side of the pelt had frozen so hard to the hair that his bed had become as rigid as armour. He was fairly trapped, and it looked to him as if he would have to stay there till it thawed, a bad prospect in an early hard winter, as he was so hampered that he could not even move an arm to get hold of his hunting knife to cut the hide open. But after a while the sun rose and loosed the grip of the frost, just as he almost gave up hope of release. If a big meat-eating grizzly, inclined for a last plentiful meal before holing-up, had come along then he would have found Nixon a "soft snap."

We broke camp pretty early and took the Ice River trail, heading now north-east. This valley is of great interest to geologists as all the mountains there are the result of the only great igneous intrusion in the Rockies and are full of all sorts of minerals, interesting to geologists and mineralogists.

It was over a year since anyone had been up this Valley, as the mining had shown that the hopes of the early prospectors possessed no solid foundation. The trail was partially grown up and Nixon had to alight very often and use an axe.

We were now fairly out of the world. Railroads and tourists and hotels might never have existed. There was no one near us and we wanted no one. To see any stray human being would have displeased us; we wanted the valley for ourselves and for the bears and moose and elk and fish. The day was beautiful, the air keen and exhilarating, for the smoke of distant fires no longer drifted over the sky. And yet even there, in this remote valley, the field of fire had, not so many years ago, ravaged and violated the stately ancient beauty of its forests. Here, again, the swift white poplar had sprung up in the fire-swept spaces, and the pines, that could not yet dispossess them of the ground they had seized on, were very slender. There is, and one may thank whatever gods there be for it, a wonderful power in the pine. Expel it with a pick or with fire, tamen usque recurret. In it is the overlasting strength of nature, and when man is no more, and the Ice River Valley without a name, great trees will grow there, hearing nothing but the call of the moose and fearing nothing but the thunder of the snow-slides. We came at last out of the poor young forest to the banks of a solitary mere or lake in a grassy flat, full enough of feed for a thousand horses. Ours were loosed and revelled in it. This night, at least, they would not stray. My white horse, named Duke, who had the appetite of a shark, almost smiled, or so I fondly imagined.

We camped some distance below the lake, which looked a little sombre and was blocked at the south western outlet with a mass of timber as if gigantic beavers had started a dam there. To the southeast there rose the mass of Mount Goodsir, a splendid piece of natural rock architecture. It is unknown to me whether this fine mountain was named after the great Scots anatomist Goodsir, but I like to think that it was. He began his work with outside observation in the Firth of Forth and might have found something here. To the north-east of the camp rose Mount Shining Beauty, as Nixon called it, though that is not its geographical name. Some poet must have named it in a summer dawn when it shone rose and gold as I saw it, and tried, how vainly! to get it on a sheet of paper with Jack Nixon's critical eye upon me. But that was the next day. With fish to catch, Jack cared as much about art or scenery as a hog does about harmony or counterpoint. As soon as the horses were knee-deep in the grass and Duke was trying to fill his "insatiable belly," Jack had his rod at work, and as he fished with bait while I tried the fly he had me beaten to a frazzle in a quarter of an hour. He caught five to my three, and every time he hooked one he let out an appalling yell of youthful savage triumph. My own flies, those I use in England, were of little use. But Nixon had come provided with some used in this country. They were really what we should call small salmon flies, and one, a little Silver Doctor, was the deadliest. Not being an expert in salmon fishing I do not know what fishermen think fish take the Silver Doctor for, but here I learnt for certain that it meant to these char a drowned dragon-fly. If they saw it they could not resist it, and I noted that the dragon-flies hawking over the lake were continually getting into the water and seemed unable to get out. If they could not do so they were presently snapped up, especially by heavy big fish far from the shore. We had what we caught for supper, and Nixon yarned about the time when he was mining in this valley. As the evening fell and eating and washing up were done with, our camp looked beautiful enough in the firelight. The stars shone above us in a clear sky, and Mount Goodsir lost its projections and was a mere splendid outline.

In the morning Nixon, Jack, N. and I went farther up the valley towards the half-circle of mountains with glaciers which close it to the north and east. The weather was still fine and the air like sparkling wine, in spite of the thin smoke cloud from distant fires. To breathe such air is to drink the water of the very spring of life. The years seem to fall away from us. They seemed to fall away from me until I tried to walk a log and then I fell in! But that was luckily much later in the day. We came through a swampy ground covered with splendid feed three feet high, after a mile or two of a hard trail in which carrying a rod already set up was not easy. We passed a salt lick pool fed by some saline spring. It was obviously a great meeting-place for elk and moose. Their tracks covered the muddy surface in and about the water, the tracks of old bulls, cows and their little calves. Mixed with these even if they were not made at the same time, were the tracks of black bear and grizzly.

A mile or so farther we came to another lake covered with dead timber. There was not a fish in it. Still farther up we reached a fine beaver dam and lake in which stood the best and largest beaver house Nixon or I had ever seen. It was, perhaps, over five feet high. Nixon photographed it for me with my camera while I fished. On this occasion I wiped young Jack's eye, for I got six while he was getting two. The char, if they are char, were very silvery and ran occasionally to a pound. They showed remarkably little fear of us and often lay visibly under logs in the stream and lake. The floating fly seemed to have small attraction for them, but as soon as my clumsy and heavy Silver Doctor sank towards the bottom they came out and took it as if I was not there. If they missed it, as they did when two or three rushed at it together, they came again, although I was forced to fish with a very short line as the scrub was close behind me.

A more beautiful place can hardly be conceived. It has all the possible elements of what used to be known in Victorian times as the "picturesque", a dreadful word which I am happy to think is now dead of overwork. With big rock masses, mountains, snow peaks, lakes, forests and shining glaciers at the head of the valley, what more was there to ask for but flowers?

THE WOLVERINE PLATEAU

By REGINALD TOWNSEND

(reprinted by permission from 'Country Life' August 1926)

The Canadian Rockies seen from the train are magnificent; seen from a motor they are even more splendid; but to spend weeks among their fastnesses far from the beaten track, mounted on a sure-footed pony, that is the climax of thrills; then only do you realize to the full the majesty of these mountains. Was it any wonder, then, that our little party journeyed to the place in the heart of the Rockies in British Columbia where we were to meet our guides one sunny July morning, with light hearts filled with the keenest anticipation?

Our head guide was Walter Nixon. Six-foot or so under his broad sombrero, Nixon is the embodiment of all the best that tradition has assigned to the Westerner. A keen judge of men, he could size you up in a minute — not that you or any one else would ever know his verdict. Possessed of a rare sense of humor that makes his eyes twinkle, and of an unfailing good nature, he is the type of man that would make his mark in whatever circle Nature chose to place him. Nothing could and nothing did go wrong under his guidance.

We found our ponies, thirty-two in all — for we needed many pack horses for the camera outfits — waiting for us at Kootenay Crossing. Now it had been ten years since we were on horseback and then only in the East. Consequently we approached gingerly the mount that Nixon assigned to us. However, our fears were groundless, for the Indian ponies are as safe as rocking chairs, and mine was no exception.

Under a sunny sky, with the grasshoppers shrilling about us, we set gaily out; but as we wended our way upward the sky became overcast and the wind began to moan through the pine trees in a melancholy way, as though some one were drawing his fingers loosely over the strings of a giant harp. Clouds began to pile up and soon we were in the midst of a fine thunderstorm. Ordinarily we do not like thunderstorms much, particularly on the top of a mountain; but the country was so wild and the storm so unbridled in its fury that we felt exhilarated.

We camped the first night in a little patch of woods not far from a lake, tired, stiff, but supremely happy, especially after a good meal of flapjacks and other delicacies of the woods. For among other things, Nixon is a Professor of Flapjackology.

Next morning we were up early and, the guides having built a raft, with much effort we poled about trying our luck. That afternoon we had another "adventure." This time "Bob" Roberts, the photographer, proved the victim. In his anxiety to get good pictures he was always poking about in unusual places. Seeing mine host Gibbon catching a trout, he decided he would like to snap him in action. So he climbed out on a tree over the edge of a bank and told Gibbon to hold still. To the latter's surprise, on looking up a few seconds later, all that could be seen was a madly churning bit of foam and water, out of which emerged an arm frantically clutching a camera. The branch had broken!

Our next camping place proved to be by the side of a beautiful lake 7,500 feet in altitude, of the clearest emerald color, set in a bowl of mountains that towered rugged and snowclad above it. As soon as the tents were up and the horses unsaddled and turned out, we put our fishing rods together and started out to try our luck. It didn't take long to find out that the lake was full of splendid trout — cut-throat trout, that get their name from the little red line around their gills. However, the two feminine members of the party put us all to shame by catching the largest number of trout. That night the afterglow lasted far into the night; one could read until ten; and the thrushes sang in the woods long after we had climbed into our sleeping bags for the night.

One of the joys of riding along the trail was the mass of alpine flora one encountered at every step. Here were fields covered with masses of purple or white heather that would have brought a small fortune at a florist's. Solomon's seal — false and real — forget-me-nots, anemones, avalanche lilies, and buttercups abounded, and everywhere the gorgeous flaming red Indian paint brush so fascinating to Eastern eyes. One day — we shall never forget it — we rode for miles through ever-changing scenery and always up and up. First dense forests — Douglas fir and lodge pole pine; then into mountain meadows; and finally up the side of a mountain along a deep ravine that was to end at that climax of beautiful scenery, the Wolverine Pass. It is impossible to describe the grandeur of those rugged peaks and the glory of the distant snow-capped mountains. Suffice to say we felt mere atoms in a gigantic chaotic whole—microscopic pygmies in an enlarged Dantesque inferno—for years of erosion had tumbled the rocks about in gargantuan confusion.

We camped that night in a mountain meadow by the side of a glacier on fields of heather, from a great deal of which the snow had not yet departed. As evening drew on the sun gilded the topmost peaks of the rocks above the glacier, and occasionally a bit of the glacier would break off and go tumbling, with a tremendous roar, to the moraine below.

Here we had a rainy day, but we made the most of it by climbing the glacier and studying the fascinating characteristics of this throw-back from the ice age. Our host made even better use of this enforced rest by conceiving the idea of an association of those who love the Canadian Rockies and have ridden on horseback through them. This association, the organization of which has since been completed and is now functioning, he called The Trail Riders of the Rockies, and it is to be open to every one, regardless of sex, creed, or color, who has ridden fifty or more miles on horseback in these mountains. So enthusiastically was the idea received that we all clamored to become charter members, and our artist member set about designing a suitable emblem for the Trail Riders. By the time the details were settled, the rain had cleared off—which was a good thing, as we all had cricks in our necks from looking for a break in the clouds. While we were camped by the glacier we noticed a fascinating thing. The day would dawn cloudless. Shortly after the sun rose, its beams would strike the enclosing walls of rock that overhang the glacier, warming them. They, in turn, would warm the surrounding air, which, rising, would meet the cold air coming over the top of the mountain, and turning into clouds, float gently away. Time after time we watched the “cloud factory,” as we termed it, turning out its daily output of clouds.

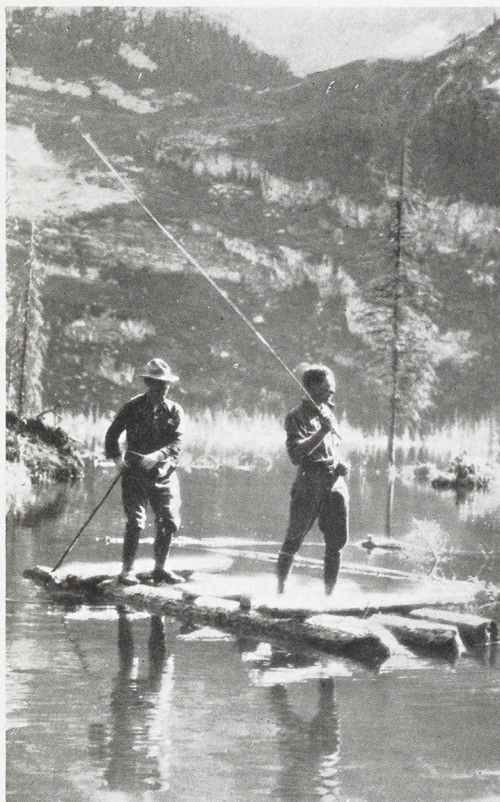

Opposite the glacier one climbed a little hill and obtained a most gorgeous view of Tumbling Creek Canyon. We have never seen the Yosemite Valley, but if it is half as beautiful as the sight that greeted our eyes here, it must be very beautiful indeed. Below us, at our feet, a thousand feet or so, was the canyon filled with the deep purples and dark greens of the forest at early twilight. From every side thin wisps of vapor were curling upward, as from a thousand ghostly Indian tepees pitched in the valley below, and circling the golden hued mountains. To the right a patch of sunlight played upon freshly fallen snow on a mountain top, and far away—as far as eye could reach—the Bow Mountains, bare and rugged, barred further view. We watched the colors changing from light green to lavender and to purple as the valley slowly faded out. Then just for one instant, as darkness drew on, a shaft of light pierced the gloom and fell on Castle Mountain in the distance. For a brief seconds the rugged turrets and pinnacles of this magnificent, aptly named mountain glowed red against the far horizon, and then the night shut down. But it was enough. Memory retains what the eye loses.

The last day we dropped from the heights into this lovely valley. Past waterfalls, through streams, we went, frightening a coyote who ran off with his tail between his legs, until we came to a clearing in the woods, where we found the Indian Paint Pots. Right in the midst of the forest Nature has planted these mineral beds that yield today brilliant ochres, just as they yielded them centuries ago to the savage for his war paint, long before the white man came to deprive the redskin of his territory.

Some few moments we lingered and then, urging our ponies, continued on our way. Now as we were proceeding in single file, as was our front, we heard a strange whirring sound. We paused, turning questioningly in our saddles. An airplane patrolling over the woods for forest fires, we thought. Then, lo and behold, a hundred yards ahead around a bend came an automobile. We had reached the Banff-Windermere highway. We were back in civilization, and the great trip was at an end.

The winning photograph taken during last Summer's Trail Ride by George Vaux for the Silver Cup presented by Reginald Townsend is reproduced in the May issue of “Country Life in America.”
